A Stroll with the Mayor

Etsushi Uchida, Mayor of Urayasu City

Urayasu Honey Project®

Long ago, Urayasu was a prosperous fishing town, where the agricultural and fishing industries thrived. However, the implementation of the public waters reclamation project to address the water pollution in Tokyo Bay and the opening of the Tozai Subway Line and other advancements in urbanization led to the disappearance of primary industries from Urayasu.

Aware of this facet of the city's history, students from the School of Hospitality & Tourism Management at Meikai University started the "Urayasu Honey Project," a beekeeping business that aims to revitalize the local community. They are engaged in beekeeping as a primary industry that can be carried out in urban areas, which is in line with the current times.

The project started in March 2022 as an extracurricular activity for students, based on urban beekeeping operations in Ginza. Using the beehives they have set up on the roof of the university buildings, the students are involved in all stages of beekeeping, from rearing and honey gathering (primary sector), production of related products (secondary sector) and sales (tertiary sector). They have managed to achieve sixth sector industrialization all on their own.

The bees from the project collect the nectar of the spring flowers in Urayasu, such as cherry blossoms and azaleas, which allow them to make delicious honey in the summer. This year, the project was able to collect about 100 kg of honey.

This project is filled with the passion of Meikai University students: connecting the people of Urayasu with nature through beekeeping, providing honey to restaurants in the city to bring smiles to all, and interacting with children through flower-planting activities. The honey produced is sold at events in the city. Since fiscal 2022, it is also available as a hometown tax system gift. In addition, the project also conducts tours for children in the city.

Just so you are aware, I would like to point out that honeybees are gentle and they will die if they use their stinger once. Only those involved in beekeeping are likely to get stung, so there is no reason for residents to worry.

In addition to Meikai University, there is also a beekeeping operation at Tums Urayasu Hospital. The city will continue to support these efforts to create new local specialties and revitalize the community.
